Paul Van Lange is Professor of Psychology at the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam and Distinguished Research Fellow at the University of Oxford. His research focuses on the psychology, economics, and evolution of trust and human cooperation as well as the psychology of climate change, intergroup conflict, soccer, and norm-violations in society. Key questions focus on differences between individuals and groups, moral judgment, culture and communication, especially how individuals and groups regulate cooperation norms in different societies. He has published 200 scientific articles in psychological and various transdisciplinary journals. Recent articles have addressed cultural influences on aggression (Behavioral and Brain Sciences), social mindfulness and refugee help (PNAS), corruption reinforced by institutions (Nature Human Behavior), change and continuity in prosociality across six decades (Psychological Bulletin), and climate change and COVID-19 (Annual Review of Psychology). He has come to appreciate to reach out to the general public to provide analysis of real-world phenomena in media interviews and to give workshops and advice to mayors in the Netherlands and to governmental professionals across Europe. He also works together with climate scientists, economists, philosophers, political and other scientists in the Adapt Academy at Utrecht University, the Amsterdam Sustainability Institute (ASI), and the Peace and Conflict Studies Center (PACS). <http://www.paulvanlange.com/>
